

Idaho Educators Reflect on their Idaho's Journey Experience

New Knowledge

"You get below the surface of the obvious to discover the heart and culture of Idaho's most valuable history—its diverse populations."

"I learned about the depth of pain still being felt today by some of the groups with unresolved grief. This awareness will help me confront my assumption that things that happened a long time ago are over and dealt with."

"I never realized that Idaho was so diverse in the 1800's and wonder how we became so homogeneous in the 1900's."

"It's really opened my eyes—especially about people right around me."

"Idaho's history is full of people who decided to do the right thing."

"I appreciate the resiliency of the people. It gives me hope in the light of current human rights struggles in Idaho."

"It is well worth it—full of rich information that gives depth and compassion to the understanding of human rights."

From Knowledge to Action

"It increased my commitment to help my students grow culturally."

"I have been given new information that will help me speak for diversity."

"I will make an effort to speak for those in need when I am confronted with the situations that need my input."

"I will share the historical struggles with my students so they can relate with their current economic, race and ethnic struggles."

"We have a history that we can learn much from. I will focus more on these issues when I teach social studies and in everyday situations."

"I have more of a commitment to hearing both sides of the story before making any decisions."

"It takes a small number of committed people to trigger a change."
